

Success: A Book of Ideals, Helps, and Examples for All Desiring to Make the Most of Life (Classic Reprint)

LiM iNAKY (description seems hardly necessary in a book whose every page is intended to stimulate, inspire, and encourage youth of all ages to do something and be somebody in the world, and to make the most of themselves and their opportunities. But a few words in explanation of the author's method of treating the various subjects considered may not be amiss. Nearly every youth has ambitions to succeed in something. For success, heads ache, hearts pant, and hands work, everywhere and always. Whatever may be the motive or ideal, whether high or low, good or bad, the watchword and the goal are usually the same success. But very few people are so constituted that they can overcome adverse circumstances without a spur of some kind, and in this volume the author has endeavored to furnish incentives to higher ideals and nobler endeavor. He has aimed to teach his lessons, as far as possible, by entertaining concrete examples. He believes that whoever would help the average twentieth-century youth must first interest him. Mere abstract precepts and goody-goody moralizing will have no effect for such a youth, and it is only a waste of time to lament the fact. Of course it is true that the spark should be in the horse; but, when it is not, we must put it into the whip. Yet the energy of the least ambitious youth is only latent. There is gunpowder enough in most any one if we can only get the spark to it. To do this is the work of every true teacher.
